The new extension building was intended to be designed as a "garden pavilion", enhancing the garden expression by reflecting it, instead of imposing its presence. It replaces a group of old annexes with no functional or historic significance and adds a relation with the street level, introducing a feature specific to its service program.

This volume facing a lateral street appears as a fenestration gesture of the existing wall, therefore seems natural and integrated in the long-standing image of the street. As a result of the differences in elevation between the three streets that border the lot, the extension building has a minimal visual impact, regardless of its area, that is similar to the existing house area, therefore doubling the serviceable area of the complex.
